A small seed that will change the world

A large, faint, light green watermark of the Yggdrasil tree is centered on the page. The tree has a thick trunk, a dense canopy of leaves, and a complex, interlaced root system. The text "The Yggdrasil project" is overlaid on the tree in a light gray, sans-serif font.

foreword

If you want to change the world for the better, you need to understand three things.

- Man hates change
- Man is selfish
- man cannot do otherwise

I think mankind will be more successful in settling on the sun than in turning our beautiful home planet back into a paradise.

Actually, everyone who realizes this should lose hope and just try to get their own little life around with dignity.

I think we shouldn't do that though!

I too was shocked when I realized the true extent of the problem. All of a sudden, I realized that all my efforts, all the books I'd written, all the posts on social media and all the trouble I've gotten myself into, aren't going to change people.

On the contrary, I have achieved nothing more than turning the majority of people around me against me and closing them down even more.

No, with accusations and enlightenment, humanity and its genetic programming cannot be dealt with.

"He who knows his opponent need not fear the outcome of a thousand battles"

(Quote: SunTzu)

Anyone who really wants to change something must have understood humanity and its motives.

Because he who has recognized that everything bad in the world only results from the fact that man, like every other living being on this planet, only follows these two universal directives:

- Survive
- multiply

All actions and all efforts of mankind serve solely to obey these two directives.

Satisfaction of needs according to Maslov - more is not possible.

Esotericism and religions do not play a major role. At best, they are more or less successful attempts to bring man's instincts under control.

The same applies to constitutions and laws. All just attempts to control the instincts of man.

History teaches us beliefs come and go, empires rise and fall, order follows chaos, followed by order that crumbles back into chaos.

Nothing, absolutely nothing in the universe as we know it is made to last forever.

This is life, this is the universe we know. This is how man lives his existence on earth.

I've come to the conclusion that this is all the way it needs to be!

The world is just like that. Man can't get out of his skin.

His genetic programming just forces him and us to behave in this catastrophic way.

If no gods come down from heaven and lead us to the promised land, then the world – meaning the existence of the human species – will perish.

You and I will not change anything without the so often expected "leap in consciousness" of people and the resulting insights and changes in behavior.

It will only take time.

New empires will come. New alliances, new wars, new suffering and new misery.

Let's accept it.

However, what we can do is try to contain the damage. Ease suffering, reduce misery and most importantly, give hope.

Please let me come to the project without further introductions and explanations.

For further background and causal chains, I offer you a personal conversation.

I am also happy to provide you with my books "Internal Error - Welcome to the Social Credit World" or "Do you still think or do you already know" (as an audio book on YouTube or as a Kindle version directly via the contact options in the appendix), which form the basis of my findings and thus the cause of this project.

The Yggdrasil-Project

The current state

The world is ruled solely by capital.

Governments merely govern – the course is set elsewhere.

It was always like that and unfortunately it will always be like that.

If one translates "capital" as "control over resources" then it becomes obvious that it was never different. Whoever possesses or possessed power and control over resources and has/had the strength to keep this position, ruled and still reigns.

I claim that 99.99% of humanity has submitted to this system and the resulting consequences and constraints, consciously or unconsciously, more or less.

Very, very few people consciously reject this system.

So if we take this system, which arose from human genetic programming, as having the greatest probability of being irrefutable, then it is completely pointless to tackle it with any kind of "hit-and-run" actions.

It's like trying to push down a mountain.

It is just as pointless to stand in the way of the powerful in the form of revolts or even wars. Firstly, the groups that gather the courage to rise up are far too small to change anything, secondly, even if a government is actually toppled, what comes next?

There were enough great and brilliant ideas that were supposed to advance mankind and in the end, only brought more suffering and cost more human lives. Socialism, communism, all brilliant, but not to be implemented with people, as history has taught us.

And how about without the form of non-government? In an anarchy?

We wouldn't have any order, but the needs and the resulting actions would still be there. A carnage without equal.

Since, as it seems, democracy is now also going to the dogs, only pure capitalism in the guise of a pseudo-democracy or quite openly in totalitarian forms of government remain as the only forms of society that can be carried out with people.

"The king is dead, long live the king", the poor always stay poor.

History shows us.

revolution and counter-revolution. Suffering, suffering, suffering and time goes by without anything changing in the system.

I think you should be smarter about it.

If the mountain has the nerve to stand in the way of us who have set out to make the world a little better, well, then we'll just go around the mountain!

Let's be like the proverbial water. If the mountain is in the way, then we just flow around it.

The few who have understood life and the basics of human coexistence and want to do their part to reduce suffering should also understand that there is no point in trying to implement this with protest or even violence. It just wastes power...until it finally fizzles out.

Let's learn and come to terms with the rules. Let's use the gained understanding and the laws of the system.

One could say that we should learn to use the "opponent's" weapons against him.

If humans, according to their genetic programming, are compelled to obey the two universal rules and only engage their reward system when a certain behavior is worthwhile for them, then so be it.

If the elites are only interested in the environment, in sustainability, or in humanity if it increases their power and wealth, then so be it.

Then we know what we have to do.

It just has to be worth changing your attitudes and actions!

Let's talk about their reward system!

Man is nothing more than a flesh-and-blood robot.

If his reward system is addressed, one day he will do exactly what you want him to do. Without any pressure or use of force.

History shows us more than clearly.

Pavlov's dog.

And as is well known, the standing drop wears away the stone.

Like the rivers that dig deep into the ground and create grandiose canyons, this path of rewarding at the deepest psychological level has what it takes not only to reduce suffering in the short term, to make the world a little bit better in the medium term, it could, once initiated, finally and above all gently guide all of humanity in the right direction.

This is the only way it can succeed.

In concrete terms, this means that we cannot prevent the world from splitting into two camps again. In the now economically weak western bloc and its elites, who, after the global economic crisis that is now soon due, will be busy saving their wealth and repositioning themselves until 2050, as Claus Schwab from the WEF writes in his book "The Great Reset" has proclaimed and as has its advocates, e.g. Prince Charles of England, Bill Gates, Soros and many others of the old system, apply. And in the Sino-Russian bloc. China, as the senior partner of this power structure, has masterfully prepared for the coming and will use the global economic crisis to take over economic world domination from the USA and grow into an all-dominant giant. Once again, the only thing that will protect us from a hot nuclear war is the nuclear balance. However, smaller conventional wars or “proxy wars”, as we know them from the heyday of the Cold War, will also overshadow the future.

Much, much suffering is inevitable.

But let's not let that intimidate us.

Yes, it's going to be a tough time, especially for the West. But even that will only be a moment in human history unless we manage to eradicate ourselves.

But let's look at it with equanimity.

If that should be the destiny of all of us, then so be it. According to our current state of knowledge, the universe will do just fine without us.

However, if we want humanity to continue, we must, for better or for worse, do something.

So we have a gigantic task ahead of us.

the goal

The goal must be to find a way to make the world a better place.

This path must not only bring about temporary changes, but should permanently change all of humanity insofar as it experiences humanity, charity and the protection of the planet as "useful" - i.e. as "profitable".

Since we are, thank God, unable to change the universe and the existing laws of life, this new path must conform to the prevailing systems and make use of their means and possibilities. The new path should be planned across generations and, from an initial phase, be able to grow independently as soon as possible and the resources required for this, in line with the rules of the universe and the resulting, only over thousands of years, practicable and with the People agree system of capitalism to procure independently and by their own efforts. Any influence by politics, economy, religion or others must be excluded

In other words:

The ideal would be to establish a consortium/holding/investment company (“company” for short) that, with sufficient financial strength, politically and religiously independent, for the purpose of advancement and development of people in need and to protect the planet, invest strategically in companies and/or set up subsidiaries that, according to the company's agenda to be drawn up, aim to create decently paid, humane jobs, and much needed and/or profitable, for the company goals strategically interesting products and services to produce locally. This enables the company to exert a targeted influence, particularly in crisis and/or emergency areas, through work, income and resources. The aim must be to position this company as financially strong as possible and to keep it potent through a strategic mixed calculation.

Only in this way will it be able to promote cross-generational projects that have the potential to bring about lasting changes, yes, maybe even change humanity a little bit.

A positive antithesis to the existing situation, if you like.

Let's take this seed together and plant a little tree. Tend and care for this. Keeping him from human greed and lust for power until he grows up.

Has grown into a tree of life.

A tree of life whose task it will be to stretch its canopy of leaves protectively over the environment and man. Its fruits will nourish and teach humanity for countless generations and slowly and gently raise it to a new level of consciousness.

A level of consciousness on which man has recognized and internalized his personal benefit in preserving and protecting what nature has given us.

The way

If we want to change something for the better, we have to use the means that actually lead to the goal.

As a German citizen, I have been living permanently in Asia for political reasons for around 10 years, eight of which have been in Southeast Asia.

Many people in the region are dependent on international aid, since even in our modern times, there is an extremely unequal distribution of resources and there is still deep poverty.

Every well-known aid organization is on site with a lot of money and many highly motivated helpers. They are doing their best to alleviate the acute suffering and to bring people forward here.

Unfortunately, as a reaction to this, a real "taker mentality" seems to have developed. The well-intentioned help means that in the countries in need of help, people increasingly do nothing themselves, and it is better to wait for some kind-hearted and highly motivated helper to come and bring money and gifts.

A cargo cult, if you will.

This is not only a very human, a very sad development, but above all a disastrous one.

The help of the locals for their fellow citizens is available, but it is rather provided by the poor for the poor. Among the really many super-rich in Southeast Asia, you rarely find anything like charity or humanity.

All my efforts so far to persuade the wealthy of the countries here, to which I have access at all, to cooperate in any way, have remained without exception fruitless.

We have financed all the help that we have been able to provide ourselves over the years and with the help of some of our local employees, who we will continue to employ for as long as we can, although we do not actually need any employees in times of Covid-19 or can finance them at all is possible for us.

A really sad picture. And it's very, very hard for us when we can't help someone.

But that is the reality of our time.

Humanity already offers a poor picture.

My team and I do not want to go the ways described above, the really necessary help from organizations and private individuals.

We just want to try something different.

Especially if you look at politically motivated and government-sponsored "aid".

For example, like one of the last great deeds. Western intervention in the crisis region of Afghanistan.

If you think about how the West, "to protect its citizens" and for "humanitarian reasons" gave about two hundred and forty thousand lives and about 2 trillion US dollars in twenty years of war, swapping the Taliban for the Taliban and a robbed the whole people of any future by simply leaving them back to their tyrants.

I think it would be better if we refrained from "help" of this kind.

But, in my opinion, that simply has to do with human nature. First of all, people think only of their own well-being. And if one or the other gives or does something with a good heart, a large part of it may even be lost on the way to the needy.

We actually know better.

Money rules the world - money is power - power creates opportunities

Once again, if we really want to make a difference, the following conditions must be met urgently:

- We have to understand that people can be brought to a lasting change in their ways of thinking and behaving non-violently, solely through their reward system. Humans function primarily, equally solely, in accordance with the universal quest for survival and proliferation. Nature wants it that way. Evolution only promotes behaviors that give the species an advantage in its struggle for survival. Most empires grew out of violence and selfishness. Not out of charity or humanity. There is only one rule in nature: "The fittest survives". There is not a single example in history where it is not so. To this day, this is done with blood whip in hand. If a nation goes off this path, i.e. loses strength, it will be taken over by a stronger faction or pushed into insignificance. This is exactly what happened with the Persians, the Greeks, the Chinese, the Mongols, the Goths, the French, the Germans, the Soviet Union and finally, the West in modern times.

- It has to be understood, if I want to achieve something, I have to do it out of strength. Not out of weakness. The philosopher and general SunTzi, or in Chinese Sun Wu, knew that more than two thousand five hundred years ago. He wrote a book entitled: "The Art of War", in which he not only made it clear that war, life, love, the economy, yes everything that affects us, works according to the same rules, and that, if you want When you win a battle, know everything about your enemy and yourself, know the location of the battle, familiarize yourself with the weather, use everything at your disposal, use your best troops and strike with all your might. Everything is struggle. Fight for survival, fight for resources, fight for power, fight for love, fight for recognition. Who, if you please, comes up with the idea that it would not be the case with humanity and charity? Even Jesus. The Messiah, or Son of God of the Bible, "fought" against conditions on earth. Everything is fight! So if I want to change something, then I have to face the fight and be prepared accordingly.

Bruce Lee, one of the greatest martial artists of modern times, once put it this way:

"Better a warrior in the garden than a gardener in war".

- Equally fundamental, however, is the fact that nature also knows very well "sharing" or "taking care of others". What we might describe as love, charity, caring, etc. Unfortunately, this usually only applies to members of one's own group (family, village, group of people, people, etc.), since it helps to strengthen one's group and thus provide oneself with a benefit. Man still does not recognize himself, or perhaps will never recognize himself as a species and certainly not as part of the "total organism earth". Without the "leap in consciousness" that is so often sung about, it will probably be nothing. Giving one's resources to people outside one's group goes against the rules of nature, as it weakens one's group and strengthens another.

Apparently, the universe doesn't plan for that.

- It's not as if humanity doesn't always produce individuals who feel the desire to act selflessly and give love. There are just too few. And their deeds and gifts will never be able to fundamentally change anything for the better. We adore these people... and rightly so! But do we change our behavior or does it change the genetic code of humans towards more charity? Unfortunately, no. The stimulus that is set there is not strong enough. Especially since it doesn't bring any evolutionary benefits. There are and remain small rays of hope, like the Christmas miracle (Christmas peace of December 24, 1914) in the First World War. But after that, the evolutionary madness resumes its usual course. So we are happy about every single act of charity, big or small, and warm our hearts with it, but this will not bring about a change in our behavior.

If we have understood the above, it leads us to clear insights:

1. No matter which conventional path one takes, the world will remain the same.
2. So if you want to achieve a fundamental change, you just have to trick evolution
3. Any action designed to change human perspectives, motivations, and the resulting behaviors must appeal to the human reward system, which follows the universal rules of nature.
4. All attempts to bring about change through coercion, punishment, violence, etc. will only show temporary success, since they are incompatible with the laws of nature and thus with the possibilities of mankind and are therefore doomed to failure. As soon as the pressure subsides, nature goes its own way again. Like a river that you can dam up or move the river bed. However, as soon as the dam breaks or the new river bed is not maintained, the river will go its own way again.
5. There is no united humanity and therefore no unified morality and no uniform values. The religions of mankind and the ideas of "right or wrong" anchored in them as well as the underlying moral concepts are simply too contradictory to be taken into account. Hundreds of millions of people died as a result of religiously motivated wars, persecutions and massacres. For this reason, state, political and religious influence should be rejected as far as possible. Likewise, one should not interfere in political, religious or state-supporting issues and take positions. You should aim for a neutral position if possible. Because the most important thing is that you are not hindered in bringing the help to people.

6. There must be a clear internal goal and orientation, agreed and manifested, which one should follow if possible.
7. This task must consist exclusively of
 - i. to promote the global situation of humanity and nature.
 - ii. to balance the unequal distribution of resources and knowledge and access to them.
 - iii. To counteract poverty, hunger and suffering locally through suitable projects.
 - iv. To strive for economic balance and equal opportunities for people in the form of economically managed companies and strategic participations in companies.
 - v. To contribute to aligning living standards as far as possible.
 - vi. To contain and reduce environmental pollution through suitable measures and undertakings and, if possible, to recycle the polluting substances profitably or to dispose of them in an environmentally friendly manner, if possible also profitably.
 - vii. To carry out biologically meaningful renaturation and to find ways to use the world's resources in a more sustainable and environmentally friendly way
 - viii. To help people to help themselves as much as possible.

I think that if you have taken the time to read this writing, then you are certainly one of the small group of people who realize that the way mankind has been trying to handle it for millennia cannot go on. Our planet is ready to get rid of the human plague. We are suffocating in garbage and there are almost no fish left in the sea. We are talking about overpopulation and aging of the people in the industrialized nations (including China). We allow ourselves to be lied to and used by corrupt and damn incompetent politicians who have lost all traction. We don't care about humanity at all and for us nature is just the beach with palm trees and a 5-star hotel.

I'll tell you what.

Nature don't care about us either. In a few hundred thousand years after our extinction, nature will simply start all over again.

What do I actually want from you?!

I want your attention!

Because I have the plan and maybe 20 more years of my life that I can give to the cause. But you have the means that will enable me to make this plan a reality.

Social media is full of good advice, soft criticism, loud criticism, hatred and despair.

But criticism and despair shouldn't be the only things we're capable of. You achieve absolutely nothing with it!

Just think of Salman Rushdie, or Greta from Sweden. Both are absolutely right in their portrayal of things. Their criticism is absolutely correct. They went public and received encouragement and criticism. All good and correct.

But did it bring anything? No - nothing has changed.

It is simply a fact that the existing system does not want any change in the rules of the game!

It's just human nature to act selfishly and use their means to maintain their power... and vice versa.

So who do you think will do what if not me and you?

Yggdrasil, the World Tree shall become a reality!

final word

If you look at people's actions and the motives behind them, you can get the impression that mankind, despite being many thousands of years old, is still a stupid child.

I don't think children should be brought up with limitations, punishments and chastisements. Strictness should only create a framework in which the children can grow. Otherwise, I think guidance and a role model behavior are the better parenting measures.

You know, ultimately, nothing is made to last forever. Believers believe that our lives have meaning. If that is so, I for one cannot believe that the meaning of life can be to get rich unbridled and walk over dead bodies in the process.

No matter what and in what you believe. The world needs help and the world needs you!

I am a small and utterly unimportant flash of energy in the infinity of the universe... just like you. Sooner or later nothing will remember you or me. Just as little as rulers, kings and super rich. No matter how rich or powerful they may have once been. Nothing will remind you. The only thing that matters is the here and now. Only now do we have the opportunity to act.

Help me to make life a little better here and now.

With kind regards
